Brilliant!

By sylvia.b

I very much enjoyed this autobiography. I learned a lot about cattle ranching in Colorado. Which honestly, I knew nothing about. But I even more enjoyed the adventures overseas. I do look forward to an autobiography from David's wife, Karen, to hear the other half of the story.

Excellent, well written 5 stars

By Amazon Customer

I would endorse the comments of the two earlier reviewers. However, in so doing, I would say that this book is not “debris from a sinking ship” i.e. Flotsam. Rather it is the account of a man who has been successful in two totally different careers, and one who has a remarkable memory for detail. It is both interesting and entertaining.

On the one hand there is the cowboy cum partner of a cattle feeder business in Colorado and later in Russia. On the other is the academic economist at home as student at London School of Economics, and professor at Berkley, Colorado State and the International Water Management Institute in Sri Lanka. In this latter role he is concerned with the broader issues of agricultural and economic development. But he occasionally stops to do something practical like inventing a gadget for squaring the circle on pivot irrigation.

Those who have met or even known the author on his travels around the globe may only know one half of the story, either the business man or the academic. They will have to read this book for the rest of the story.

Finally, the one common denominator, where-ever Seckler traveled it seems that the people drank a lot. However, I am sure that his 4 to 9 AM working hours were never disturbed by a hangover. Workaholic-yes;

alcoholic-no

An American Life Generates a Great Read

By Peter Lydon

Highly recommended, and hard to put down. These salty, sardonic recollections of an American who has led an adventurous and perceptive life both at home and abroad are a page-turner. From a farming and farm business family background in Colorado, David Seckler was untypical enough to be reading Kant before he finished high school. He went on, via the London School of Economics and a published dissertation study on Thorstein Veblen, to be an econ professor at Colorado State and Berkeley, and an international water expert travelling the world and then running an important irrigation institute in Sri Lanka. He reports vivid experiences along the way, not only in his family and businesses in the United States, but in India and Bangladesh, Africa, the Soviet Union and other countries. It becomes clear that Seckler is one of the technical and economic experts, far from faceless, who created the modern world economy, especially its agricultural side, with lots of intense "learning experiences" along the way, recounted here with panache and zing.
