Outstanding Short Story

By Marion Stein

This is a superbly written short story about a teenage girl in Lagos who witnesses a "necklacing." The descriptions are deceptively simple, but give the reader a clear picture of who the character is and what her life is like. The incident is also well described including the way mob violence can quickly break out. While so many writers waste so many words to say nothing, the author here offers one liners that tell us everything.

There is some use of local pigeon English in the dialogue. The author offers unobtrusive footnotes, but I think most readers will be able to figure them out without looking at the notes. Also in there's a short afterward where the author explains the practice of necklacing.

Readers are not often invited to share the point of view of characters like Oshoke, poor, uneducated, and unattractive. I am grateful to Somi Ekhasomhi for introducing her to me.

While the story is rich in detail about a specific place and people, there is much that is universal -- the way a person like Oshoke is likely to be ignored and discounted, the way all of us are tested when confronted with evil -- Should we act? How can we act?, the way a crowd can suddenly turn. The truth is this kind of "jungle justice" not only occurs in the slums of Lagos, but in one form or another in many places, and all of us are likely at some point in our lives to be in a position where we can and should speak out.

Note: I bought the story when it was entitled: Necklacing. It has since been changed to Jungle Justice. I dislike the new title. Americans have many misconceptions about Africa as it is. This does not take place in a jungle (except in a metaphorical sense: law of the jungle, etc.) There's something a bit sensationalistic about the current title.

My heart breaks

By kwadzana

From the first sentence to the last word, I felt like I was there in Lagos. I think that is a quality of a gifted writer like Somi. The ability to transport the reader to another world, even for a little while, is the reason we read. I felt the anguish the main character felt as she watches helplessly, the horrible events taking place a few feet away. This is one of those books you will not be able to put down. My only complaint is that the book eventually ends, and I wanted to keep going. I want to keep traveling with the girl in the story. I want to see where her life takes her. I already know she is a courageous person. I have this feeling she is destined for greatness. The book left me thinking and caring about her even though she is just a character in a story. This ability to make the reader care about the book's characters is the sign of a great writer. I hope the author will somehow find more time to devote to writing so we can all have more of her books to read.

Third world justice

By Ann Little

This is a powerful story. The law and justice in third world countries begs to meet the American South pre-civil rights days. People are accused and if the crowd wants in on the horror the accused receives justice even if innocent. Nobody cares and respect for human dignity is beside the point. It disturbs me when Americans want instant justice because the media reports the accused was picked up by the police. Due process of law as spelled out in our constitution has always been the law of the land. But just not in certain parts of the land and not always in Lagos, where the story is to have taken place. I hope it jolts the reader out of complacency as it did me.
